I told Harper the only way we could answer his question was to state that the Director had appeared before the Symington Subcommittee in response to a request from the Senator which the Director did not feel he was in a position to refuse. I added that we did not consider this as establishing a precedent and the Director's appearance was made in a manner consistent with his other briefings on the Hill. # Rogers, Fulbright in Conflict Over Laos, MIRV Issues

By HENRY S. BRADSHER

Star Staff Writer

Behind the suavity of the big city corporation lawyer and the courtliness of the Southern gentleman, the conflict was steely clear.

William P. Rogers, the smiling lawyer turned secretary of state, had no intention of yielding an inch on Nixon administration plans for handling the problems of Laos and multiple nuclear warhead tests.

The soft-spoken Southerner who heads the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Arkansas Democrat J. William Fulbright, felt some changes were in order, especially in U.S. military involvement in Laos.

Maybe a dictatorship can fight a war without telling its people, but it is an extraordinary development for a democracy to do so, Fulbright said. He said it quietly, like a saddened professor.

Talk With Reporters

The secretary and the senator spoke separately with reporters after Rogers had appeared for more than three hours yesterday at a closed session of Fulbright's committee. Rogers declined to discuss Vietnam or Latin America because of President Nixon's imminent speeches on them, but he ranged widely over other topics.

Rogers told reporters he did not think there would be any change of policy in Laos as a result of recent publicity for the large American commitment in weapons, transportation and advisers to defend Laos against Communist at-

The secretary took the innocent line that the commitment had begun in the Kenned y administration—Laotians, have dated it to 1964, in the Johnson administration

-and he had thought Congress was familiar with it already.

Rogers also said a Senate resolution recommending an administration effort to arrange a mutual Soviet-American halt of multiple warhead testing was unnecessary now, since the two powers were about to begin talks on such armaments limitation mat-

Grim Exceptions

Fulbright took polite, if a trifle grim, exception to both of these points when he talked with reporters later.

"I rather think," he said, that the publicity on an American "secret army" of Lactian guerrillas under Central Intelligence Agency sponsorship would influence administration policy.

Told Rogers had indicated otherwise, Fubright said softly that he regretted it. He called it extraordinary for the united States to "be conducting quite a large war without any treaty or constitutional authorization." There is no precedent for it, he added.

Fulbright disputed the assumption that Congress had known what was going on. "I've never heard my colleagues refer to it... we certainly didn't know how extensive this was."

Committee to Move

Despite Rogers' opposition to the resolution on the warheads, called MIRVs, Fubright said, his committee would consider it. He personally favored going ahead with it, even though it is late in the testing program for the new system for a halt, he said.

testing program for the new system for a halt, he said. "I have the feeling," Fulbright said, "that this administration rather dislikes the idea of the Senate giving advice to the administration. . . I don't see anything wrong with the resolution."

Fulbright said his committee had also questioned Rogers at length on the Middle East and "had a long hassle" over the question of whether the upcoming arms talks were tied to political relations with Moscow.

Rogers had made clear at a news conference Saturday that they were not. But after a White House briefing Tuesday, two Republican leaders had made vague comments suggesting they were.

Political Clients Key

Rogers reiterated to the committee that the arms talks stood separately, Fulbright said, but noted that their progress obviously depended upon the over-all political climate between Washington and Moscow.

Sen. Stuart Symington, D-Mo., emerged from the hearing and confirmed that his own subcommittee's hearing on the U.S. commitment in Laos had ended Tuesday. He said the press had pretty well told what the committee had learned in secret.

Sen. John Sherman Cooper, R-Ky., said he plans to go ahead with his previously announced plan to try to amend future appropriations bills to prohibit U.S. troops from supporting Laotian or Thai forces.

But Fulbright told reporters money for the present Laction involvement was hidden in the budget as part of secret appropriations for the CIA.

A Senate Foreign Relations subcommittee, headed by Sen. Stuart Symington (D-Mo.), is currently holding closed hearings on U.S. involvement in Laos. It heard testimony yesterday from CIA Director Richard Helms.

Fulbright declined to discuss the testimony of Helms or other witnesses. He particularly cited a series of articles from Laos by Henry Kamm published earlier this week in The New York Times.

Laos Unlikely to Become 'Another Vietnam'

Sen. Stuart Symington, D-Mo., must be putting us on.

If there is really something that he doesn't know about our involvement in the war in Laos, he is surely one of the few senators—to say nothing of newspaper readers and television watchers—who are still in ignorance. The information has been available to him for years, and it doesn't take a full-dress Senate investigation to bring the facts to light.

The facts have often been recited. Since 1962, when all of the major powers in the area, including the United States, North Vietnam and China, solemnly agreed to respect the sovereignty, neuriality and territorial integrity of the small landlocked kingdom, Laos has been heavily engaged in war.

Today, according to Laotian Premier Souvanna Phauma, there are some 48,000 North Vietnamese troops in his country. Their main preoccupation is to secure the network of roads known as the Ho Chi Minh trial by which supplies and reinforcements move from North to South Vietnam. But they also provide the muscle for a local war of "national liberation" waged under the banner of the Laotian Communists or Pathet Lao.

American involvement in this struggle dates back to 1964, when the Russians, who had formerly supported Souvanna Phouma as a "neutralist" leader, suddenly dropped him from their list of clients. The United States moved into the breach, supplying the government with defensive weapons, which it was permitted to do under the terms of the Geneva agreement.

There have been two reasons for certain lack of publicity about American support of the Laotian government, neither of which, as Symington is well aware, was a deliberate effort to mislead the American public.

The first was the prohibition under the Geneva agreement of any foreign troops in Laos. Even though the Communists have flagrantly violated this rule from the outset, the United States has tried to adhere to the letter, if not the spirit, of the agreement.

While there are no American military advisers as such in Laos, there are no less than 70 military attaches and suporting military personnel attached to the American Embassy in Vientiane.

The second reason for not advertising American aid unnecessarily has been the delicate position of Souvanna Phouma as a nominally "neutralist" leader. As pressure against the Vientiane government has grown, this has become less of a problem. Today, Souvanna is becoming increasingly outspoken in his denunciation of the North Vietnamese invaders of his country and more insistent in his appeals for American help.

And the state of the military of the military of the distribution of the distri

Recently, American Air Force fighters and bombers flying from bases in Thailand also have been used for tactical air support and for breaking up concentrations of enemy troops. In some cases, there have been brief penetrations into Laos by American forces in South Vietnam. Communist traffic on the Ho Chi Minh trail has long been a target for B52 bombers. All this activity, needless to say, has had the tacit approval and encouragement of the government in Vientiane.

Symington and his colleagues claim to be worried that our efforts to help Laos to defend itself may developinto "another Vietnam." But there are several reasons why most experts believe this quite unlikely.

The first is that the war in Laos in regarded by both sides simply as an extension of the war in Vietnam. Although though the Communists almost certainly have the military capability of taking any major city in Laos—and perhaps the whole country—what interests them primarily is protecting their communications lines between North and South Vietnam. If there were a settlement or an end to the fighting in the South, the significance of this military effort would disappear.

The Communists seem cautious, furthermore, about provoking Thailand, which would be most directly threatened by a Communist takeover in Laos. A Communist move to the Mekong River, which forms much of the border between the two countries, might easily spark a military reaction by the Thais and a preemptive occupation of those parts of Laos which lie west of the Mekong.

But perhaps the main reason for skepticism about Communist intentions in Laos is that the country intrinsically is hardly worth fighting over.

With a population of only about 2.5 million scattered over 91,000 square miles, there is nothing in it to attract an ambitious aggressor.

Among other things, Laos is miserably poor, with yearly expenditures of more than twice its revenue. Though this situation would improve with the end of the fighting, running Laos will still be likely to be an expensive proposition for anyone who tries House Armed Services Committee, who does not foresee a request for Committee briefing in the immediate future. The present Committee workload is occupying the full attention of the members of the staff. In the area of general congressional matters, Russ commented on the Senate's Symington Subcommittee hearings on Laos scheduled for next week. He commented somewhat philosophically that it is his feeling this is a price we have to pay to maintain our democratic form of government. He did not comment on the Director's appearance, but seemed to be puzzled as to the purpose to be served by these hearings.

I briefed Mr. Blandford on the following items:

- a. Soyuz 6, 7 and 8;
- b. testing of a Soviet aircraft;
- c. Soviet-Chinese border defenses.

In an chance encounter I asked Carl Marcy, Chief of Staff, Senate Foreign Relations Committee, about the Symington Subcommittee hearings on U.S. involvements in Southeast Asia and what role his staff was playing therein. He said that Messrs. Pincus and Paul were "running this show on their own," but that he personally was following the hearings with interest and expected they would produce some very far-reaching results indeed.

Preliminary analysis regarding a new Soviet aircraft. c. Current Soviet Soyuz mission.  Blandford complained that items a. and b. above confirmed his belief that Agency estimates on such matters were often too conservative.
	I also discussed with Mr. Blandford a recent personnel case in which he was interested. (See Memo for Record for details)	25X1A
